BRYAN STILL THEIR IDOL.

There probably never has been a presidential candidate in the history of the country who went down to defeat and who yet carried with him the hopes, the faith and the affection of so many millions of people in so marked a degree as has William J. Bryan. The loss of a great national battle has usually dulled the tender attachment which the masses have felt for some magnetic leader, and after the failure the general public has marched on in search of some new idol. In the horizon of politics, stars come and stars go, and the vast vault of the popular sky has scarcely a trace left to show where once reigned the lost Pleiades of popular favor. It has not been so, however, with William J. Bryan. He still remains crowned in the hearts of the masses. His star has not set, nor yet is it dimmed, but it shines brighter than before, and it is yet to many millions of American citizens the pole star of their hope and their trust.

No triumphant political candidate was ever tendered a grander, a more heartfelt reception, than was accorded to Wm. J. Bryan in the city of Denver last Tuesday. It is doubtful if he himself was so warmly received during the heat and enthusiasm of the campaign, as he is after the echoes of the battle have died away and the political fires are out. It was not as the defeated champion of a political party that the heart of Colorado's people went out to him, but rather as the chosen and beloved crusader for a great cause—a cause whose ultimate and triumphant victory has been postponed, and is as certain to come as the stars are to sing their evening hymns, and the sun to burst forth into its gorgeous morning anthem of praise.

The power of this man Bryan over the people is wonderful. The Denver News well said of him:

In conversation, as in his public addresses, Mr. Bryan is always in earnest. He speaks from his heart and the whole gamut of emotions find reflex in his countenance, and the most consummate actor would fail in giving facial expression to the emotions that show naturally in Mr. Bryan's countenance and emphasize his utterances.

This is one of the secrets of his charm and his power. Many of the people who heard him yesterday will remember his wonderful range of expression and will wonder that one man should possess such power, but they will understand how impossible is the task of the artist charged with the production of a real likeness of William J. Bryan. But the people of this city need no portrait of their champion. His image is indelibly engraved in their hearts. He has more than fulfilled their ideal of what the chief advocate of their principles should be, and they are more ready now than ever to lend him their united and loyal support in the battle which he is waging in their interests. They are satisfied of his integrity, his ability, and above all, convinced that no triumph he may achieve, no adversity he may suffer, will ever remove him from the ranks of the plain people of the nation nor prevent him from standing ever ready to do battle for their rights.

There are millions of the best and noblest of American citizenship who will cry "Amen" to these brave words of Bryan as delivered in Denver on that day:

This campaign has ended in the defeat of our hopes for the present. We cannot tear away the veil and with our gaze penetrate the future. We can't tell what will be the ultimate outcome of the great struggle upon which we have entered. And yet I have not found since the election a single person who has voted with us who is sorry for the part taken. I haven't found a single person who, in the presence of defeat, would undo anything done or do differently from what we have done during the last four months. I wouldn't if I had this campaign to go over, knowing the result as I know it now. I would fight just as hard as I have fought—I wouldn't change anything that has been done, because I believe the seed as sown in this campaign will bear its fruits in the days that are to come. More than that, if I knew that as long as I lived victory would be delayed, I would make the same fight until my God had called me from the scenes of earth, confident that when one has done his duty as he sees it he has done all that he can be required to do.

And in that declaration, and in its accompanying avowal that this great battle for the right shall be continued, millions of patriotic American citizens, to whom defeat has come but as an invigorating incentive to renewed efforts, cry out as they don their armor for the battles yet to come: "Lead on, Bryan! We follow thee!" —Sacramento Bee.

Is never done, and it is especially wearing and wearisome to those whose blood is impure and unfit properly to tone, sustain and renew the wasting of nerve, muscle and tissue. It is more because of this condition of the blood that women are run down,
